Hundred + Heroines is a British charity focused on raising awareness of women photographers. Earlier this week, the organization added another 50 inspirational photographers to its list. Take a look at the work of nine of them.

Organization Hundred + Heroines undertook to challenge the under-representation of women in photography and to promote a wider public interest in their work.

The newly selected 50 women come from different cultures, countries and use different creative techniques. In addition to lesser-known photographers, the biggest names in the field have appeared, such as Annie Leibovitz, Cindy Sherman or Sally Mann. With the help of photography, the authors try to question gender, sexual and racial stereotypes or point out inequalities, solve taboo topics and examine

Katrin Koenning

Koenning is a German photographer living in Melbourne, Australia. While the starting point of her work lies in a traditional photographic document, the visual style reflects her intuitive and experimental approach.

Her latest series, Swell, is a protest against the Australian government's restrictions on environmental activism.

Azadeh Akhlaghi

Akhlaghi was born in 1978 in Shiraz, Iran. In his work, he draws primarily on the heritage of conceptual art and scenic photography. In a series of By an Eyewitness, numbering seventeen photographs, it shows what are called "mysterious deaths" by journalists, politicians, activists and filmmakers.

Assassinations, torture, accidents, suspicious and natural deaths. Azadeh Akhlaghi's photographs are a record of national suffering and a landmark in the turbulent times of modern Iranian history.

Tanya Habjouqa

Habjouqa is a Texas-Jordanian photojournalist, artist and educator who is primarily interested in gender issues and human rights in the Middle East. In her work we can look for a strong connection between religion, politics, economics and cultural production.

Her project Sacred Space Oddity examines the overlap between the sacred and secular life of Palestinians and Israelis and questions the dichotomy between secular and religious practices.

Arpita Shah

The photographer, who now lives in the UK, used to spend part of her life between India, Ireland and the Middle East. The author's work often focuses on the idea of home, belonging and cultural identity.

The Nalini series is an ongoing intimate project that focuses on tensions and memories across generations of women in her family.

Tshepiso Mazibuko

Mazibuko was born in Thokoza, South Africa in 1995. She uses the camera as a tool for social and political commentary.

Mazibuko documents his city, explores local life and captures a chance meeting between himself and her community.

Ute Mahler

Born in 1940 in the former GDR, a German photographer, lecturer, editor

Born in 1949 in the former GDR, a German photographer, lecturer, editor and publisher, together with six East German photographers, founded the now highly regarded OSTKREUZ photographers agency.

Tender images of Uta Mahler balancing between a documentary and a staged portrait.

Suné Woods

An artist living in Los Angeles. Her work takes the form of multi-channel video installations, photographs and collages.

In the Aragonite Stars series, Suné Woods thinks about its relationship to water. Water is important to many indigenous cultures. As a result of ecological changes, animals and livelihoods have been endangered.

Margaret Courtney-Clarke

Courtney-Clarke, born in Namibia in 1949, is a documentary photographer. Her work explores the resilience of local communities to the rapidly changing landscape of Namibia.

Her latest book, When Tears Don't Matter, tells the lives of the last Bushmen living in the Kalahari desert region of eastern Namibia.

Mohini Chandra

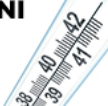

Mohini Chandra's work deals with the articulation of identity in a globalized world and the role of photography in relation to memory and migration. As a child, she spent time in Fiji and traveled extensively with her family. (Indofijians are descendants of Indian workers imported by the British to Fijian cane plantations in the 19th century.) Mohini Chandra pursues visual culture in colonial, anthropological, and ethnographic discourses.

Hundred + Heroines

On the occasion of the centenary of the right to vote for women living in the UK, in 2018 the Royal Photographic Society launched a campaign to promote women's talent from around the world. Nearly 5,000 photographers were nominated and the final 100 were selected. The independent organization Hundred + Heroines was founded by Del Barrett, then vice president of RPS, to strengthen the position of female photographers. The organization is committed to challenging the under-representation of women in photography and to promoting a wider public interest in their work.
